PixInsight LE Forum PixInsight LE LeMaitre - A free "clippy" utility to resize, crop, rotate, and enhance images. Q: Is a player the boss of that player? In three words, what can we say about a player that he/she is the Boss? A: No. An authority figure is a person with power over another person. The person with authority is the authority figure, the other person is the subject. Thus, a player is not a boss of anyone. A player is not a boss of anyone. A person who gives commands to another person is a command actor, and may be a boss. The players in a game are the authority figures. The GM is the authority figure, and he or she gives orders to all other players. A: Another way to think about this is to think about yourself. You are in charge of your own life, you are in charge of your own choices. You are your own authority figure. Thus, to say that someone is the boss of you is to say that you are under their authority, in which case, you are the boss of them. Edit There are a few different concepts here: The leader of a group is the authority figure, and people following his lead are subordinates. In a game, this is the GM. Anyone working to further his goals is a subordinate. A friend is a relative authority figure. If you don't know each other, this isn't a lot of power. But if you are very close, it can carry a lot of weight. A father figure is a more distant relative. You may have your father's permission to do certain things, or he may give you some minor instructions every once in awhile. This is the best example in real life, because someone's parent is their authority figure. The father in a game is the GM. In a lot of games, you should get this clarified before making your first move. If you are unsure, ask someone. A: A player is not the boss of anyone. As the player is not the leader or the submissive, but the authority figure, the other players are the subordinates. The reasons are: In order for a certain player to have f678ea9f9e
